Fluoridation Wins Support in Many Communities, Claim

Roy O. Gilbert, M.D., Los Angeles County Health Officer

Although 15 years ago there wasn't a city in the United States that had a controlled fluoridated water supply, as of June 1, 1958 no less than 1,851 communities throughout the nation had added fluorine to domestic water supplies, serving a total of 33,516, 121 people. It is evident that this effort to diminish tooth decay in children, and so ultimately improve the teeth of the American people, is gathering impetus with the years.

Fluoridation of domestic water supplies for the purpose of reducing tooth decay in children was started both in the United States and Canada during 1945. Statistics compiled on the experiment from 1945 to 1955 disclose an average of approximately 65 per cent less tooth decay in children of the youngest age group when fluorine is added to the drinking water. This is comparable to what is observed in children of the same age who live in areas where the water has a natural fluorine content of one part per million or a little more.

One report on the use of fluorine originated from the pioneer city of Grand Rapids, Michigan, which was the first city to add it to the public water supply. The reduction of tooth decay in this community ranged from 76 per cent in the six-year olds to 29 per cent in the 16-year old group, but was less in other children because fluoridated water was not received during the early formative years.

When fluorine is not present in the drinking water, naturally or otherwise, it is estimated that by the time children have nearly all of their permanent teeth, which is around 14 years of age, 40 per cent have already had at least one extraction. At the age of 16, the average boy or girl has seven teeth either missing, decayed, or filled.

Circling Square Does Not Get Council Support

Torrance councilmen refused to make a circle out of a square Wednesday night, even though it might have solved a bottleneck on Carson St.

They turned down a recommendation by the Traffic Commission which suggested that the square at Torrance High School be made into a circle with two lanes of traffic and parking around it.

But some residents hit the plan on grounds that it will result in loss of parking spaces.

Councilman Robert Jahn, chairman of the traffic board, said he favored the change since Carson St. will develop into one of the main arteries to serve the Del Amo Shopping Center, and the square confuses motorists.

Torrance will not be affected by a California Supreme Court ruling prohibiting use of impounded property taxes from materials and machines owned by the federal government.

Most of these levies, disputed for years, were laid on defense plant inventories.

City Manager George Stevens said the funds impounded here were never figured in making out his budget.

Torrance Unified School District will lose approximately $70,000 in revenue, officials estimated.
